TOWN PARTNERS WITH MEDICAL DEVICE COMPANY TO TRAIN FOR ACTIVE SHOOTER INCIDENTS

In an effort to continue to train first responders in an uncertain world, the Town of Hanover has partnered with Beeken Biomedical, a leader in next generation technologies offering wound care solutions.

Recently, the Hanover Police and Fire Departments conducted active shooter and mass casualty training using tactical wound care products provided by Beeken.

“We are pleased to partner with the Town of Hanover to provide our cutting-edge technology to support their important life-saving efforts,” said Beeken CEO Richard Kendall. “By partnering with the Police and Fire for training, we are giving back to the community, while demonstrating the benefit of state-of-the-art wound care,” he continued.

Hanover Fire Chief Jeffrey Blanchard noted that the ability for Police and Firefighters to train alongside one another in realistic scenarios fosters a team approach that pays dividends – and helps save lives as real-life scenarios unfold.

The town and Beeken will continue to collaborate on training, providing leadership in the first-responder community and an excellent example of a public-private partnership that works.
